Positive figures in the Eurozone

Expectations of high growth

Markets During the month of August second quarter GDP figures for the Eurozone were revised up to 2.2 percent, which is the highest since the Euro-crisis in 2011. The manufacturing industry PMI rose to 57.4, which is also the highest in several years. The leading indicators for the Eurozone are pointing sharply higher, so a recession is definitely not around the corner. Despite a strong outlook, long German interest rates dropped about 20 basis points throughout the month. The drop might be explained by lower import prices and inflation expectations due to the stronger euro, which has rallied 13 percent since year-end.

For the U.S., leading indicators topped out and began to decline slowly – but the CLI is still high. U.S. growth is thus likely to moderate over the coming six to nine months, but negative growth or an outright recession is still unlikely.

Equity markets have been slightly weak since the summer, but most of the weakness was caused by a stronger euro, which has subtracted from the return of non-European markets. The volatility index (VIX) was rather nervous in August due to the missile launches in North Korea.

Pressure on value and small cap

The Portfolio The fund lost 2.09 percent while its benchmark, MSCI World, lost 0.69 percent.

In the U.S. President Donald Trump continues to add to the uncertainty. The threat of pulling the U.S. out of the NAFTA-agreement and the controversy that followed the violent events in Charlottesville caused further uncertainty about what Trump decides to do about government spending and taxes. In Europe, the third round of negotiations between the UK and EU has begun, but in spite of the uncertainty, investors seem to feel comforted by the solid fundamental development. Nonetheless, market participants are aware that expectations globally are running a tad high, and due to the list of uncertainties, global developed markets ended up in negative territory, when measured in euros.

Reduced inflation expectations continue to weigh on bond yields and the corresponding poor environment for value and small-cap securities continue to weigh on fund performance. Especially the U.S. part of the portfolio suffered from factor headwinds, which explains almost all of the underperformance compared to the benchmark.

Stock selection was overall neutral with positive selection in the U.S. covering for the negative selection in Europe. Within Europe food retailers like Carrefour and Ahold Delhaize were among the biggest detractors as Amazon competition continues put pressure on the shares. Meanwhile, Estee Lauder was sent up from rumors suggesting Unilever and other interested buyers were preparing a bid. Gilead shares were rewarded for an announced acquisition that diversifies its portfolio with an immunotherapy specialist focusing on cancer.
